

TREVEAN COVE

At one time fishing was at the centre of this small westerly facing cove, but sadly no more, although there is still evidence of past activities with the current access to the beach.

TR20 9PF - 2kms east of Marazion at Rosudgeon on the A394 Penzance to Helston road, the road to Trevean is signposted. Follow the road for 750m where it ends at Trevean Farm. There are a small number of roadside places to park but be careful not to obstruct the road or farm gates. The footpath to the beach goes in a westerly direction around the farm and then joins the old 'green lane' (public footpath) where it links up with the Coast Path after 500m. After a short distance going in a southerly direction access to the beach is through a gate and down what was once a slipway but is now somewhat overgrown but nevertheless not difficult.

The old slipway

There is little or no beach at high water. When the tide is out it is a mixture of sand, shingle, stone and rock outcrops but this will vary with the seasons. After a long quiet period in summer more sand can be exposed. The southerly side of the beach is boulders and rock platforms. The low cliffs behind the beach are constantly eroded by the sea with evidence of quite large land slips.

There is no safety equipment and being relatively remote, care needs to be taken when swimming which is relatively safe in the right conditions, although the rocks make it more advisable at high water. It is not a surfing beach at all.

When the conditions allow there is good snorkelling at high water in a southerly direction towards Stackhouse Cove. There are many rock pools at either side of the beach.

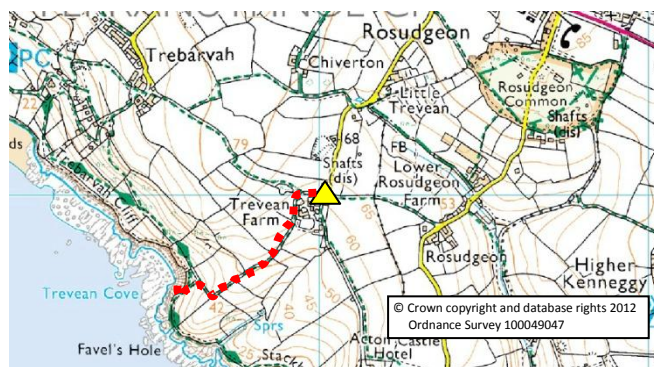

It is a dog friendly beach. There are no facilities at all, the nearest being at Perranuthnoe about 800m along the Coast Path in a northerly direction.

Water quality is good and it is usually fairly clean. A very quiet and secluded little beach that is often accessed by walking along the Coast Path from Perranuthnoe where there is parking or from Prussia Cove about 1.5kms using public footpaths.
